12. Summary of My Research Activities and Future Plans

My research and overall academic activity can be characterized by four underlying values: innovative thinking, multidisciplinary approach, practical applicability, and international exposure. I will address each of these values in detail.

Innovative thinking - My research projects seek creative and original insights on Israel's land law and property law as well as wider social or legal phenomena that stem from the Israeli land system. All of my publications highlight unexplored aspects of Israeli law and often challenge common approaches in contemporary legal research. In this regard, I have made a significant contribution to the understanding of the following fields: the formation of the inventory of public and private land in Israel and the management and privatization of the public land inventory (e.g., Basic Law: Israel Lands-Commentary); the allocation of land in the Arab and Bedouin sectors and the problems of allocating agricultural land (e.g., Land Expropriations of Private Arab Land in Israel - An Empirical Analysis of the Regular Course of Business); failures in the process of legislation on expropriation law and changing false perceptions on the dimensions of expropriation activities (e.g., Strategic Considerations behind Normative Explanations – Lessons From Israel's Supreme Court Takings Case); the exclusion of women from their share in land or Custody (e.g., Arab Israeli Women's Renunciation of their Inheritance Shares – A Challenge for Israel's Courts); the problems of funding political activities of charities and NGOs (e.g., Limitations on the Political Activities of NGOs and on its Finance); the actual applicability and relevance of the Ottoman land laws in Israel and the West Bank (e.g., Justifications for Adverse Possession Laws – The Case of Judea & Samaria (West Bank)). My publication concerning the online registration of real estate was one of the first to analyze this new issue (e.g., Real Estate E-Conveyancing: Vision and Risks). It was a direct continuation of my previous research in the field of three-dimensional partition of land, which resulted in 2018 in original Israeli legislation (e.g., Three-Dimensional Partition and Registration of Subsurface Space). Both projects aroused interest not only among legal scholars and practitioners, but also among surveyors, planners, and high-tech professionals. Both of these studies regard the technological forefront of real estate registration.

Multi-disciplinary approach - My research does not focus only on land law or property law, but rather aims at a broader multidisciplinary perspective. My studies analyze various sub-disciplines of law (property law, administrative law, constitutional law, trust law, family law, and inheritance law). They use different methods of legal research (doctrinal research, comparative research, critical analysis, feminist theory, history, and geography). I base my research on a wide variety of sources and research techniques. In addition to using English and Hebrew resources, I use my access to Arabic resources as a valuable resource for legal analysis. This may be demonstrated in my research on land law in Judea and Samaria as well as in my research concerning the settlement of Palestinian refugees in refugee camps in northern Syria shortly before the outbreak of the civil war there (e.g., The Politics of "Over-Victimization"- Palestinian Proprietary Claims in the Service of Political Goals).

Practical applicability - I believe that legal research, similar to research in other disciplines, gains important attributes when it has practical implications. Therefore, my research is motivated by its potential to influence both law and society. My insights are frequently referenced by courts and tribunals or adopted as policy (state agencies) (e.g., HCJ 5426/17). Top law firms and public institutions are seeking my professional advice. My public activities (e.g., member of the committee for framing government policy on agricultural land, military judge of land disputes in Judea and Samaria, head of appeal (examinations) committees, Council of Land Appraisal) reflect my scientific reputation and play an important role in the implementation of my research insights.

International exposure - I believe that both the local nature of land law in Israel and its socioeconomic importance justifies the investment of significant resources in research on local regulation. The Committee for the Evaluation of Law Study Programs in Israel (CHE 2015) has stated in its general evaluation report that "Because law represents a variety of choices and commitments of a given culture and society, there is an inescapably local aspect to legal regulation and, most importantly, to scholarship on legal regulation." The committee recommended to give "respect and encouragement" to those who decide to contribute to Israeli law. In particular, the honorable committee members were of the opinion that "Israeli property law, with its unique history, raises a variety of issues that should be of interest to property scholars everywhere." I share this opinion. There is great importance in exposing Israeli land law in all its aspects to the international academic community, and I consistently and systematically spare no effort to achieve this outcome. The achievement of this task involves considerable objective difficulties such as the focus of the international academic community on global, theoretical, or sometimes American aspects of law. In this context, I consider it a special and great success to publish papers in respected peer-reviewed journals regarding very controversial aspects of Israeli land law such as expropriation law, the issue of discrimination against women regarding inheritance, land laws in the West Bank, and the implications of the Americanization of legal education on Israel's land law (e.g., Legal Colonialism - Americanization of Legal Education in Israel). I consider my book Land Law and Policy in Israel-A Prism of Identity, which has been accepted for publication by Indiana University Press as the most significant contribution to the exposure of international community to the secrets of Israel's land law and policy.

In the coming years, I will keep the same principles I elaborated above. More specifically I intend to focus my theoretical research on two main directions: While I try to conceptualize the relationships between the latest technologies and legal innovation in the field of land law, I am working on comparing the process of development of equitable rights in different indigenous and nomadic societies. While these two directions may appear as completely two opposites, I assume they both may help us better understand the nature of the process of legal innovation. At the same time, I intend to work vigorously to make the insights gained from my research accessible to both the Israeli and the international general public, while addressing issues in the field of real estate law through a personal professional blog. I also tend to widen the research of the legal system of the Palestinian Authority and Other Arab jurisdictions.
